Control, Conflict, and Corporate Rescue

The ongoing financial crisis brings into focus the question of how best to respond to corporate distress. Commentators tend to agree that companies whose fundamental business proposition is no longer viable should be liquidated with due speed. There is also widespread agreement that a distressed company may nevertheless have an essentially viable business. The value-maximising response in this case is to attempt a ‘rescue’, that is, to try to preserve the business as a going concern. But how should corporate rescue regimes be structured so as to be efficacious in this respect? Who should control the company while the rescue attempt is underway, the ‘debtor in possession’ or another entity? Should the proceedings be shaped by the interests of the creditors as a group or only of the senior lender? And should these interests be conceived in purely financial terms, or should other factors also be given a role? This paper considers these questions in the light of theory and recent empirical evidence, particularly from the UK.
