Professor Furse will give his views on key aspects of the Anti-Monopoly Law in China, and on recent developments in Hong Kong. Some writers, particularly those from the US, have been very critical of the Anti-Monopoly Law. Professor Furse will argue that although as a text it is imperfect some of the criticisms made have been misdirected, and that the European perspective would generally be more positive than the American perspective.

Professor Mark Furse is a Professor of Competition Law and Policy at the University of Glasgow. Professor Furse has been working with competition law for over 20 years. He has written extensively about competition law, and is a General Editor of Butterworths Competition Law Service and sits on the editorial board of the European Competition Law Review. He is currently working on a major book on competition laws in China, Hong Kong, Korea and Vietnam.
